Lucas jumped off his porch and stared up at the sky. It was a dangerous looking day. The trees whipped around him, bending like licorice. He furrowed his eyebrows in concern. The tornado siren hadn't gone off yet, but he was sure that this was the exact weather for one to form in. He watched the dark clouds as they swirled above his head, and felt a twinge of nervousness in the pit of his stomach.

This wasn't going to be the kind of day where anyone could relax.

Suddenly, he saw a brief glimpse of a funnel cloud. It was enough for him to call it in and get the siren blaring.

A lot of the people in his town were oblivious to the weather and its dangers, but he had lived through tragedy once before and moved to a place where he had been under the illusion that he was safe from natural disasters. Unfortunately, nobody could ever guarantee him that kind of safety, and there he was, identifying the baby stages of what could turn out to be a dangerous tornado.

He ran inside to his phone and called the police station.

“Hello, Detective Jeremy Wilkins speaking. How can I help you today?” a deep voice answered on the other end.

“Hi, I've just seen a funnel cloud and needed to inform you,” Lucas said, trying to keep his voice from quaking.

“A funnel cloud? Are you sure?” the voice asked. Lucas heard concern in the voice, and it made his own resolve to stay calm waver.
“I'm quite sure,” Lucas said.

“Well thank you for letting us know. We will make sure this and the surrounding counties are appropriately notified," Detective Wilkins said.

"Thank you," Lucas answered.

"You're welcome. Thank you for your call," Detective Wilkins said before hanging up the phone. A few seconds later, Lucas heard the tornado siren explode into the air, and he walked restlessly around his house with a deep pit of dread nestled in his stomach. He couldn't do anything to shake his anxiety, and so he paced, hoping for a way to stay calm and wait out the rest of the storm in peace.
